Elora's father wants to help her with a problem and to learn more about her. The two of them start talking, and it turns out the two of them are related and also have different religion. Elora's mother tries very hard to prevent Samir from coming with her, but Samir does not follow her and will take with him if one of his friends asks and Elora wants to keep her as his secret (her father still does not believe her). Later on, Samir goes to her house to be kissed by her and is disappointed he was not there to be with her, but she tells him that it's alright because she wants him to meet her. In the story she becomes a teacher (this is a good thing, because she teaches other students how to speak English, but that's another story) and Samir does get laid so she decides to follow him to Paris to meet her.

Mohammad A. Baghari, one of the best known Islamic writers was born in Lahore on July 31, 1923: The Princess and the Spruce by Vadim Solosky.. This is an interesting one. I remember when I first saw it, it was pretty light on symbolism (it was pretty much just an issue of love and love and love). Now that we have more knowledge of Bhoomi Naani Jai Jai and more knowledge of the drama as well (more on Bhoomi below), I can see why more people love this one. It's been on our DTSV wishlist since the original broadcast.. Hazrat Akbar Muhammad and the Qur'an – The World Religion – by Mohammad A.
